Abstract: Asia’s giants are raising in India and China. Both nations are the populous in the world, and their populations are rising highest. Furthermore, their bilateral connection has increased with substantial expansion of China and India’s global diplomatic and economic impact. China and India have co-existed in harmony for centuries, being two of the oldest cultures in the world. Both countries have tried to develop political, diplomatic and economic relations successfully. China has become India’s largest trading partner and its policy and security ties have been strengthened by the two nations. China has emerged as India’s largest trading partner, with two countries trying to broaden their economic and military ties. In the current global economic situation, the economic relationship between the two countries is considered one of the strongest bilateral relations and this development is anticipated in the coming years. A number of issues, including diplomatic, fiscal, cultural and military cooperation, are under development in both the nations. The relationship between the two governments is substantial; the role of each other on key issues is far more thoroughly understood and the shared goals are much more visible.

Keywords: India, China, bilateral relations, international policy, economy, cooperation, conflicts.

INTRODUCTION

From the first century since Easter. Both nations had substantial cultural interaction from India to China with Buddhism’s expansion. There have been conflicts of interests in Tibet between two nations. When the civil war ended in 1949, China needed the rule of Tibet to be persuaded and the citizens of Tibet free in 1950 by using weapons from Lamaism and feudalism. Nehru assured Chinese leaders that India did not have any strategic, geographical ambitions or clear values in Tibet to quit confronting China. to prevent antagonizing China [1]. In May 1951, the Tibetan representatives concluded with Indian help an arrangement acknowledging the authority of China, believing that there would be a continuation of the current political and social structure in Tibet. By the end of the Korean War (1950-13), two Asian giants started to negotiate directly, with the aid of India [2]. In 1954, India signed a Tibet eight-year treaty, which paved the way for ties in the shape of panchasheela. In the 1950s the term became Hindi-Chini-Bhai-Bhai [3].

There is physical integration and unparalleled flow of ideas with increasing economic and commercial ties. The strategic and cooperative relationship for peace and prosperity between China and India has been growing steadily since the beginning of the new century. China-India trade was conducted in 2011. All nations with a combined population of 2.5 billion have joined forces to strengthen their relationship and cooperation. The shared openness has become the foundation for improving bilateral relations between two countries [4].
POLITICAL RELATIONS

The partnership between China and India has been developed in the second century B.C. Two prominent Chinese Buddhist monks Fahien and HuenTsang had come to India in order to learn the Buddhist scriptures. The Buddh-Buddharmma Indian monk arrived in China to join the Chan sect. In the early 1950s, China and India had good relations. The meeting of Nehru, Indian Prime Minister and Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai was shared. Both leaders’ shared efforts made the popular five principles of peaceful coexistence [5]. Premier Zhou travelled to India in 1960 for a dialogue over border disputes. In 1962 India, along with China-India boundaries, launched an armed attack on China. The consequence was a cold bilateral ties time. All countries took measures to appoint ambassadors in 1976. The then foreign ministers Mr. Vajpayee, who visited China in 1979 and Mr. Huang Hue, visited India in 1981. A trade agreement was signed between two parties in 1984 [6]. Rajiv Gandhi visited the border council in late 1988 and set up a joint task force on boundary issues, joint cultural, financial, scientific and technological and civil aviation committees. Throughout Prime Minister Li Peng’s visit to India, in 1991, a consular protocol on consular generals was concluded. A document on the development of frontier commerce and scientific/technological collaboration was signed. The Chinese General Consulate of Mumbai was reopened in early 1993 and the Indian General Consulate in Shanghai. During the Narasimha Rao visit to China, the two nations signed an agreement to maintain peace and tranquility in the border areas between the Chinese and India, the atmosphere, radio and TV and to open up more borders in China. President Jiang Zemin made a visit to India at the end of 1996 to create a positive relationship focused on 5 principles of peaceful co-existence towards the 21st century. The then Foreign Secretary of India, Jessant Singh, said in 1999 that the other side should not find others a danger and should embark on a phase of change and growth.

The first round of security dialog was conducted in March 2000, by foreign ministers from two nations. In November 2006, the Chinese President visited India and the joint statement on the establishment of relations in all fields was provided by both sides. A Joint Paper on "A Shared Vision for the Republic of India and the People's Republic of China, the 21st Century of the Planet," describing foreign and bilateral problems, was released on 13–15 January 2008 during Dr Singh's visit to China. In October 2008 Dr Singh also visited China to take part in the 7th Asia-Europe summit in Beijing, which was conducted from 24 to 25 October. The Indian President Mrs. Patel attended the reception to mark the 60th anniversary of CPAFFC and Embassy of India's diplomatic relations. Chinese premier Wen Jerboa signed six agreements on cultural exchange, green technologies, newspapers, hydrological knowledge and bank exchanges on three days in India from 15-17 December 2010. The tour was expected to meet a bilateral trade target of $100 billion by 2015. There was established a strategic economic dialog and CEO platform and 2011 became the "Relationship Year." In Sept 2011, the Minister of Foreign Affairs met with Chinese Minister of Foreign Affairs as part of the meeting of the UNGA (UN General Assembly) BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa) [7]. China is not recognizing as an independent Indian region Arunachal, the POK (Pakistan Controlled Kashmir) and J&K (Jammu and Cachemire). The whole of the Arunachal Pradesh and the whole Kashmir, between India and Pakistan, are the targets of the arguments of Beijing. Beijing Until recently, China kept Sikkim under illegal occupation as an independent country. The current scenario between India and China varies greatly from 1962. The 15th round of special delegates on the border issues between China and India was conducted in New Delhi on 16 and 17 January 2012 [8]. Chinese Special Envoy Dai Bingguo, State Councillor, and Shivshankar Menon, National Security Councilor, addressed the two countries’ border problems extensively. The conference saw the signing of an agreement on developing a system of communication and cooperation on the border relations of India-China by members of both governments. To ensure that the existing international system continues to fundamentally shift, both sides will aim to broaden collaboration, improve communication and drive China-India forward strategic partnerships.
Their ancient civilizations, the symbol of unity, are well-known to China and India. The students of the renowned Nalanda University were the hundreds of Chinese academics. In the Buddhist congregations the Chinese academics engaged before others. In ancient times, India and Chinese scholars like Fa-hein, Sung-yun, and Hieu Tsang came to India as well as the Sanskrit scholars like Dharmaraha, Kumarajiva, Buddhajiva, Dharmaikha, and Sangabhuti. Hunting and Fa-Hein had filled the Indian past with their writings as an inseparable part of India. All nations are a vast country with many citizens. Soils are abundant in both nations [9]. It's honest and hardworking men. The land and labour resources are enough not only to sustain their national presence but also to lead to foreign growth. On a visit to China in 2003 by then Indian Prime Minister Atal Vajpayee, both parties agreed to build and promote the development of each other's cultural centres.

Later on, shipbuilding and membership on sea routes became more common. A major sea connection was made in South-East Asia. Many Indian states acted as an intermediate state for the further spread of Indian and Buddhist culture in China. Canton became a thriving port, the most popular landing point for Buddhist monks from India since the seventeenth century. In India, the Chinese monks began to study in India, such as Taxila and Nalanda University. Founded in the 4th century B.C., the University of Nalanda was one of old India's biggest successes in research. In the 7th century at Nalanda University, Chinese scholar and explorer Hieuen Tsang (600–54 AD) gave details of the excellency and integrity of monastic life here. Through Chinese texts surrounding not just Buddhism but also Hinduism, physics, arithmetic, medicine, etc., many Indian works have been preserved. In the past, Indian, Chinese and Tibetan academics cooperated regularly. The Sanskrit Tibetan Chinese dictionary of Buddhist terms has been one notable example of this cooperation. China and India are expected to make a major leap in ties between Beijing and the Shankaracharya of Karachi. This voyage is now known as a "civilization quest" that gives two Asian giants a new dimension of modern touch. The wing also has a free library in India with about 3000 reference books. Indian Cultural events, sponsored by local organizations, are coordinated by the Indian mission in Beijing and consulates in Shanghai and Guangzhou all year long. Indian soldiers have also taken part in the latest multilateral activities in China, such as the Guangzhou Assyrian games (2010) The Chinese Ministry of Culture, the Asia Arts Festival (Zhengzhou) 2008 and the Ordos 2009 Competition.

CONCLUSION

This paper examines the changing expertise and nature of these economies increasing trade integration with the rest of the world. While China has become a major focus of an increasingly segmented global manufacturing process, India has become more specialized in some specialized services sectors with proportionately higher cost values. However, serious challenges remain for both, with India expanding its industrial base beyond its current service capabilities and China adapting to the crisis and improving trade conditions. It also reviews macroeconomic policies and exchange rate regimes for both economies. This suggests that serious distortions may have occurred due to the fiscal interference of the authorities, which strengthened the exchange rate between the two countries and thus accumulated large reserves, leading to a potential imbalance in the global economy. Even contributed. Leading the current crisis. But the exchange rate policy between China and India, perhaps even in China, has contributed to providing exports to both countries and, in part, to protect against the global financial crisis. The sharp decline in exports in the real aftermath of the global crisis will encourage both governments to focus more on domestic market development.
